An experienced actor, somewhat overblown and self-important but also intelligent and capable, encourages his ragtag team of players to stage a production of As You Like It. There are a few problems with this idea: there aren't enough cast members to play all the parts. Two of the lead actors have recently left the group. Another has remained but can no longer perform her role. To top it all off, there might not even be an audience. Is his desire to go forward with the performance foolhardy or valiant? Can it be both? What will happen? Let's find out...

All photography and recordings of this performance are prohibited.
